The National Education Policy's (NEP) introduction of the four-year undergraduate program at the University of Delhi has had a significant and expected impact on the placement landscape for the 2024-25 academic year. A notable portion of students who would have previously graduated after three years have chosen to continue their studies for the additional year to complete the new four-year degree. This transition has naturally led to a temporary reduction in the number of final-year students available for placement, resulting in a lower overall placement percentage for the year. This trend is anticipated to be a short-term effect of the curricular reform and is not indicative of a long-term decline in the college placement record or the quality of its students.
